Estimation of bacterial removal in leachate recirculation systems (LRS) for landfills: effect of the dilution factor of recirculating leachate. Since 1996, organic leachate has been recirculated through a LRS to reduce landfill gas emission in a landfill with ongoing subsoil gas collection. Modeling of the kinetics of the organic matter decomposition in the LRS and data from previous investigations show that the recirculated LRS leachate is less concentrated in organic matter than the influent leachate and has a lower caloric value. The first aim of this study was to determine the dilution factor of the recirculating leachate compared to the influent leachate in order to model the change in the characteristics of the recirculating leachate and to determine the required process changes. A second aim was to determine the volatilization potential of the recirculating leachate. In three leachate-sampling campaigns, the concentrations of oxygen, chloride, ammonia and sulfide in influent and recirculating LRS leachate at constant flow rates of 200, 400 and 700 m<sup>3</sup> m<sup>-2</sup> d<sup>-1</sup> were determined. In addition, the organic matter content and the volatile matter content of the recirculating LRS leachate were determined. From these data, the dilution factors of the recirculating LRS leachate were estimated. The results showed that the dilution factor was 3.8 for oxygen, 6.3 for chloride, 5.0 for ammonia, and 1.1 for sulfide. The decrease in the caloric value of the recirculating leachate was lower than the average decrease of 20 kcal kg<sup>-1</sup> O<sub>2</sub>. The oxygen concentrations in the recirculating LRS leachate were
